I moved recently to an area which does not get many clear radio channels. I can only get TV through a satellite system which I have chosen not to do because of the lack of credible programming. My son gave me XM radio for Christmas and it has been a life line to the world. News, music, weather are all valuable and XM is my primary contact with them.

The NAB should be ashamed of itself and offer better programming rather than try to shut down competition. I would not have had to use the XM services if I had had better radio reception and better channels to choose from.
